Pages that contain a form that uses the GET method, for example, <form method="GET" action="/example.php">. When forms are submitted with the GET method, the input data will be appended to the requested URL, for example site.com/page/form.php?name1=value1&name2=value2. These URLs can be cached, and accessed directl y by anyone that knows the URL, including Googlebot. So, it can causes issues with crawl efficiency or index bloat. To fix it, consider switching the form method to POST or disallow crawling of URLs that form submission generates in robots.txt file.

Page has content-type other than text/html: 2 pages

Pages where HTTP header Content-Type is empty or has any other value except text/html. Specifying the content type helps the user agent understand what type of content it is, improving the user experience by displaying content in the best possible fashion. You should specify only text/html content type for HTML pages to communicate to browser what type of content it should loads.
